CHARLES-TOWN, July 11.

No doubt a particular Account of the Tranſactions betwixt this Government and the Creek Nation of Indians, when the Headmen were laſt here, would be agreeable to all our readers; but as there were ſeveral Conferences, it is impoſſible to put them into this Paper, yet we ſhall here inſert the Governor's firſt Speech to them and their Anſwer to it.

The SPEECH of His Excellency JAMES GLEN, Eſq; Governor, to King Malatchi, the Red-coat King, the Wolf King, the Otaſſee King, and the other Chiefs, Headmen and Warriors preſent, of the Upper and Lower Creek's, in Number about 100.

Friends and Brothers,

I HAVE given my hand to each of you, which is the ſalutation that has been commonly uſed by governors of this country to Indians, and expreſſes that they are welcome.

I have given you my hand, as a pledge and token that you are under the protection of the government, and that you ſhall be ſafe in your perſons and properties while you continue in this country, at leaſt, that whoever offers violence to either ſhall be ſeverely puniſhed for it.

I have given you my hand, as an emblem of friendſhip, as a ſign that we are tied together by treaties, and that the Engliſh and Creek's are joined and united together by the ſtrongeſt and moſt ſolemn contracts and covenants: We therefore call you by the ſacred and beloved names of Allies, Friends, Brothers: We conſider you as our ſecond-ſelves; and I once more, in the great King George's name, bid you heartily welcome to his country of Carolina.

I would have received you upon your firſt arrival, but I thought it reaſonable to allow you a little time to repoſe yourſelves after the fatigues of ſo long a journey; beſides the day ſucceeding your arrival was, with us, a great beloved day, a day which we dedicate to the cares of another life.

I have ſent for you on a buſineſs of great conſequence to the welfare of your nation, and I am glad to ſee that the king and all the great men of the nation are come down upon that occaſion: I miſs few or none but the Gun merchant, and I am ſenſible that his heart is here, and it is probable that he may have ſent down his mouth alſo; Duval's landlord, or the Wolf, who are both his friends, will know it: I miſs alſo Braket and Chigilli, but they are both ſo old as to be unable to travel, and I knew Chigilli thinks that when Malatchi is here there needs no other. Malatchi is here, and it is with great ſatisfaction that I ſee the ſon of our good friend the worthy old Prim, I reſpect him as ſuch, but he is ſtill more to be valued upon his own account, as he is an honeſt brave man, and a good friend to the Engliſh.

I ſent for you to ratify and confirm the peace betwixt you and the Cherokee's, but there are other matters of equal, if not greater concern, for, at all ſolemn meetings, the treaties betwixt the Engliſh and their friendly Indians ſhould be firſt renewed.

The Engliſh never make any treaties of friendſhip or commerce but with the greateſt deliberation; they obſerve ſuch treaties with the greateſt punctuality, and are very vigilant that others ſhall do ſo, for they will not ſuffer the ſmalleſt article to be infringed; and it would tend to your happineſs, if you were equally careful and would watch over the beginnings of evil, for ſometimes a ſmall ſpark, if not attended to, will kindle a great fire, a ſlight ſore, if ſuffered to ſpread, may endanger the whole body, and therefore it is beſt in the beginning to lay it open, and take away any of the corrupted blood or matter, but if this has been too long delayed and neglected, it may ſometimes be neceſſary to cut off the rotten member.

This was really the caſe of your nation: Some of your people ſeemed not to have had that regard which is due to the friendſhip of the Engliſh; from ſmall faults they proceeded to greater, and at laſt went very dangerous lengths: They came armed into this country, and way laid the Cherokee's, and killed one of them in the midſt of white men in our ſettlements; and, as if this had not been ſufficient provocation, they came afterwards to Charles-Town in great numbers, where ſome Cherokee's were at the ſame time, and tho' your people were cautioned by me not to hurt them as they were then under our protection, and though they poſitively promiſed that they would not touch them, yet, forgetful of the caution I had given them, and in breach of their poſitive promiſe and engagement, they fell upon them the next day, and murdered ſeveral of them near this town: I was alſo afterward informed, that ſome of your people had attacked our traders in the Cherokee's and robbed them of their horſes, had broke open their ſtores and robbed them of their goods. I therefore ſent up an agent, to put you in mind of your true intereſt, and to demand ſatisfaction, particularly for the murder of the Cherokee's; and I deſire to have from your own mouths, a public declaration of what has been done in that matter.

As for the blood of the White man ſpilt at the Abicoochi's, one of the towns in your nation, it was prudent in you to inſiſt that we ſhould have ſatisfaction for it, and we accept of the ſatisfaction given; but for the future, nothing will be deemed a ſatisfaction for the lives of any of our people, but the lives of them who were guilty of the murder.

After the treaty with the Engliſh is renewed, it will (I think) be proper for you to confirm the peace, propoſed by me, betwixt you and the Cherokee's; and I wiſh it were poſſible to fall upon ſome method to prevent the too eaſy breach of it, and to render it durable. You have formerly complained to me, that the Cherokee's had permitted your enemy the Northern Indians, to come thro' their country to war againſt you, and ſupplied them with proviſions and ammunition, and that this was one of the greateſt grounds of your quarrel with them: The Cherokee's acknowledge the charge to be juſt, but alledge, that they are unable to prevent it, for it often happens, that when they are out a hunting, the Northern Indians come into their towns well armed, and in ſuch numbers that they cannot reſiſt.

But as both the Creek's and Cherokee's are our friends, I muſt acquaint you, that many of the Northern Indians in like manner are our friends, and I could wiſh that all Indians who are in friendſhip with the Engliſh were alſo friends with one another: I am therefore deſirous to have a peace made between you and the Seneka's, and ſuch Northern Indians as are our friends, as I lately made a peace between them and the Catawba's; and if you are deſirous of ſuch a peace, let me know it, that I may deſire my brother the governor of New-York, to interpoſe his good offices.

The Governor having ended his Speech, expected that they would have taken ſome Time to conſider of it, but perceiving that they intended to ſay ſomething, and the Council being of Opinion that it might have a good Effect, to permit them to make an immediate Reply, more eſpecially as His Excellency had demanded an Anſwer with regard to ſome Facts that required no Time to conſider of, they were told, that if any of them inclined to ſay any Thing at preſent, they might ſpeak.

Upon which Malatchi delivered himſelf in the following Words.

I HAVE now ſhaken hands, and I have always obſerved the treaties ſubſiſting between the Engliſh and us. I never ver had the pleaſure to ſee the great King George, nor to hear him talk, but I now ſee your excellency who are his Repreſentative, which I look upon as the ſame thing, for you are in his place; and I have now heard your talk, which is very good, and perfectly agreeable to my own ſentiments; and I ſhall always be careful to obſerve the treaties between us and our friends the Engliſh, and we hope we have never made any great deviation from them.

The great King George has no doubt well conſidered of the moſt likely method of eſtabliſhing a friendſhip betwixt his ſubjects the Engliſh in this country and the Indians, and wiſely concluded, that the moſt likely way to unite them and to cement a friendſhip betwixt them, would be by trade and commerce; and as he knew that the Indians were a poor people, and had few or no goods to give in exchange for thoſe things they might want from the Engliſh, therefore it was agreed upon, that ſkins ſhould be the commodity to be given in exchange for what they might ſo want.

It is true, they are of ſmall value in themſelves, but as they are the moſt valuable thing that we have, I have ordered my people to bring a few as a preſent to the governor in the name of our nation, and they are now laid upon the floor at his excellency's feet, and we pray his kind acceptance of them.

GOVERNOR. It has been an old cuſtom, before my time, when the Indians came to viſit the governors of this country, that they made them a preſent of ſkins, in token of their being our friends; and it has been frequently done ſince I have been in this government, but at no time was there ever ſuch a quantity given: As therefore your preſent is greater than formerly, I interpret it that you are now more our friends than heretofore. The ſkins are indeed valuable in themſelves, but they derive their greateſt value from their being a preſent from ſo good friends.

KING. The governor was pleaſed to ſend for us, and we are accordingly come to hear what he had to ſay, but I did not expect to hear that our nation would have been accuſed for the faults of a few private men, or that the Headmen would have been blamed for it; we neither conſented to or approved of the miſchief that was done by thoſe people, nor did we know any thing of their deſigns or what errand they were gone upon; we imagined they were gone out into the woods a hunting as uſual, or about their own private affairs.

But when I was informed of what had happened, I conſidered within myſelf what would be the conſequence, I ſoon ſaw that it would not be paſſed over or put up with, and I concluded that you would certainly ſend to demand ſatisfaction; and therefore, when your agent did arrive, I was not at all ſurpriſed. I knew the buſineſs he was come upon, and I acknowledge that it was right for the governor to ſend an agent to inform us of thoſe things, and to demand ſatisfaction.

On his arrival, he, agreable to the inſtructions that I apprehend he had received from your excellency, communicated the whole matter to me and Chigilli; and acquainted me of the ſatisfaction he was ordered to demand, and tho' I was pretty clear in my own opinion, that it was juſt and neceſſary to give the ſatisfaction, yet I did not think it would be adviſable in me to take the whole upon my own ſhoulders; I thought it would be more prudent to conſult with the beloved men, it being a cuſtom with us to conſult our beloved men upon all affairs of importance, as I ſee you adviſe with your beloved men here preſent. [Pointing to the gentlemen of the council]

When the beloved men were met, I acquainted them that the buſineſs that was now to be conſidered was of ſuch conſequence, as to have occaſioned you to ſend up an agent, and therefore ought diligently to be inquired into: Upon inquiry, we found, that the behaviour of ſome of our people in your country had been very bad, and that the inſult and injury done by them could not well be greater; we found that blood had been ſpilt at your very gates; we therefore, all of us, thought it right and neceſſary, that ſatisfaction ſhould be given.

As there is no evil without an original cauſe, we turned our thoughts and inquiry to find out who was the author or perſon chiefly concerned, for a man will ſometimes employ others to commit what he does not care to put his own hand to, or be ſeen in himſelf; and we found out, that the Acorn-Whiſtler, a great headman and warrior, was the contriver, promoter, and inſtigator, and ſole cauſe of all this miſchief: We therefore thought, that he was the proper perſon that ought to ſuffer, and ſome of his own near relations who were there preſent, ſaid that he deſerved death, and voted for it; and there are ſome of them here now preſent ready to declare it. He accordingly was put to death for that offence, and tho' he might, in former times, have been a friend to the Engliſh, yet of late he had formed and hatched very dangerous ſchemes, and gave out very bad talks againſt the Engliſh, that might have been attended with very pernicious effects, had they not been prevented.

As I have ſaid that he was a very great man, and had many friends and relations in different parts of our country, we thought it moſt prudent for ſome days to conceal from the public, the true reaſons of his death, it being then not generally known but to the headmen who had concerted it; this we did for fear that ſome of the deceaſed's relations ſhould, in their firſt heat, and before they were fully apprized of the matter, and the true reaſons, revenge his death upon your traders; but we looked upon it, that it could have no bad conſequences, if the matter was fully divulged and all the circumſtances explained, at a general meeting, which was accordingly done and all things approved of. As therefore the ſatisfaction demanded has been given, there remains nothing further for me to ſay upon that head; and therefore, I hope our friendſhip with the Engliſh, will ſtand upon the ſame good footing as heretofore.

As to the other matter that your excellency mentions, the irregular behaviour of ſome of our people, particularly their taking away the goods and horſes from the Cherokee traders, we were very ſorry to hear of it. We acknowledge, that our young men do many things they ought not to do, and very often act like madmen; but it is well known, that I, and the reſt of our headmen, did all in our power to oblige them to make reſtitution, and moſt things have been reſtored; I rode about from town to town, and gave all the aſſiſtance therein I could to your agent, and I muſt obſerve that he took a great deal of pains, and was at much trouble, to bring theſe matters about, and ſo did that woman his ſpouſe. [pointing to Mrs. Boſomworth]

When we were in hopes that all matters were ſettled and over, another accident happened, that created us freſh trouble and uneaſineſs: One of the Chickeſaw's who live in our nation, in a drunken fit, ſhot a white man: Immediately upon my hearing of it, I conſidered with myſelf what was moſt proper to be done; and I thought, that if we ſhould ſend down to give you intelligence of it, and ſhould wait 'till your anſwer ſhou'd come, that it would be giving you unneceſſary trouble, and that much time would be loſt; and therefore, as I knew that you would demand ſatisfaction, I concluded that it was beſt to give that ſatisfaction at firſt, and before it was aſked; I accordingly took my horſe and went with your agent, and as the place where the fact was committed lies at a great diſtance from me, I called at ſome other towns in my way, and took the headmen along with me, and we inſiſted upon ſatisfaction, which was accordingly given: The blood of an Indian was ſpilt for the blood of a White-man; but it was the uncle of the perſon who committed the fact, who voluntarily killed himſelf in his ſtead, as a ſatisfaction to the Engliſh.

GOVERNOR. We muſt be ſatisfied with what has been done, ſince that is your way; but for the future, in caſe any Indian happens to kill a White man, we ſhall expect that the principal ſhall ſuffer for the ſame: And in like manner, if any of our white people ſhall be guilty of the murder of an Indian, he ſhall ſuffer for his crime, and we will ſend for ſome of your people to be witneſſes to the puniſhment.

KING. Every thing that the governor has demanded has been complied with, and every that he ſhall be pleaſed to deſire ſhall be done; whatever he is pleaſed to order ſhall be obeyed, it ſhall be ſo: And we hope, that whenever we have any grievances to complain of, they will be redreſſed, or any thing of that nature to requeſt, it will be granted.

As to what the governor has been pleaſed to mention about the peace with the Cherokee's, we came down on purpoſe to conclude it in the governor's preſence, not doubting to have met the Cherokee's here for that end: We wonder that they are not come, for we know that they were ſent for. However, it gives me a great deal of pleaſure to be with the governor; vernor; we are glad to ſee him face to face, and to have a talk about all theſe matters from his own mouth. It is a very good cuſtom, as the governor obſerves, that our treaties with the Engliſh ſhould be firſt renewed, this I very much approve of; and that when any differences happen, they ſhould be made up; whereby all matters and offences will be buried in perpetual oblivion, and not a word to be ſpoken about them any more.

Every thing is now ſettled, and the treaty is renewed; and it gives me great ſatisfaction, to ſee that every thing that has been done is agreeable to your excellency.

As to the affair of making peace with the Northern Indians, it is a matter of great conſequence, and will take ſome time to deliberate upon: It is not that I have forgot what you ſaid upon that ſubject, for I was very attentive to all that you ſaid, and it made a deep impreſſion upon me, but I will conſult with my people upon that affair, and will let you have an anſwer.

GOVERNOR. What reſolution you come to upon that matter, I hope you will communicate to me here, in the council-chamber. I ſhall not detain you any longer at preſent, but deſire, that you and the headmen will dine with me to-day, at my houſe.

Mr. M'Gillivray was ſworn truly to interpret all that paſſed, and to give, not only the ſenſe, but the words; and having perused the above ſpeeches, he declared, that they contain not only the perfect ſenſe and meaning of what paſſed, but the preciſe words, without any addition, omiſſion, or alteration whatſoever.
